

To Whom It May Concern,

I've known Adam Braimbridge in a personal and professional capacity since 2004 and would have no hesitation in recommending him to any employer considering him for work in the web development field.

Adam's skills range from one end of web development to another, and during the many projects he's worked on for me either in part or in full he's been an invaluable resource in design of HTML and CSS, development of PHP and backend functionality and database engineering.

Adam's single strongest quality isn't that he knows everything - in my experience few developers do. It's his ability to stick with a task until he figures out the optimum solution. Time and time again I've found his determination to find the answer more valuable than being a walking encyclopaedia of web development because his process of problem solving inevitably presents opportunities to improve a project in ways that weren't originally scoped.

But Adam's not just ahead of the curve when it comes to using the tools. He has a deep philosophical love of trends in the field and he's on the cutting edge of design and interactivity ideas that will define the way the web works in the near future, such as the art and science of usability.

He's a pleasure to work with, has a friendly, relatable demeanour and (unusually for a developer) a great deal of communication and human skills. His sense of humour is as sharp as his appreciation of all things web, and letting him go by could be one of the worst business decisions you make this year.

Please contact me any time for more information.
